Harry Browne, who twice ran for president as the Libertarian Party candidate, died on Wednesday at his home in Franklin, Tenn., March 3. He was 72.

Harry Browne was born in New York City on June 17, 1933, and grew up in Los Angeles. He currently resides in Franklin, Tennessee. Browne was the presidential nominee of the United States Libertarian Party in the elections of 1996 and 2000.

Harry Browne was a candidate for the Libertarian Party in 1996 and 2000. Other candidates for nomination included Don Gorman, Barry Goldwater, and Pat Buchanan.

On Tuesday, the Libertarian Party announced that it had chosen Dr. Ben Stein to be its presidential candidate for 2012.

The Libertarian Party has never won a presidential election, but it has received more than 4% of the vote in three elections and has been included in television debates.

Harry Browne, who spent his career as an economist, was known for his advocacy of individual liberty, free markets, and smaller government. He was a strong proponent of the Gold Standard and was a critic of the Federal Reserve System.

Browne was a frequent guest on television and radio shows and was a regular contributor to such publications as The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times. He was also the author of several books, including "Free to Choose" and "Ain't No Reason to Be Sorry: The Life of Huey Long."
